How did the Fund perform during the reporting period?

All securitized sectors successfully navigated a changing monetary-policy landscape marked by a significant interest-rate sell-off and flattening of the Treasury curve. Securitized sectors broadly outperformed Treasuries over the twelve months ended August 31, 2026, benefiting from superior yields per unit of duration that helped shield investors from rising rates.

Following three Fed rate cuts in late 2025, policy shifted sharply in 2026 under the new Fed Chair Kevin Warsh as renewed inflation pressures prompted a hawkish pivot. Market expectations shifted from approximately three rate cuts entering 2026 to three rate hikes by the end of August. The 2-year Treasury yield rose 87 basis points through August, while the 10-year rose 52 basis points and the 30-year finished at 5.24%, its highest level since 2007. Corporate credit spreads remained historically tight despite a brief widening following the outbreak of Middle East hostilities.

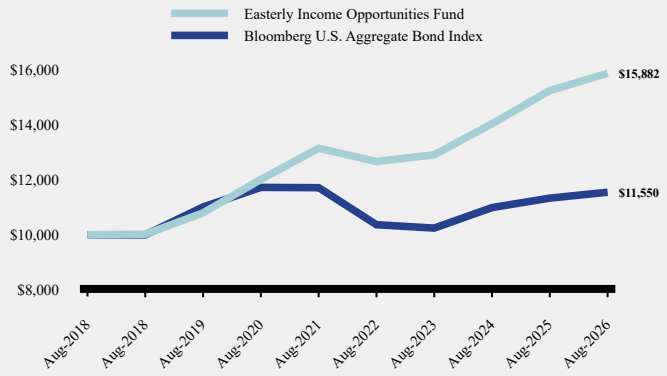

Residential mortgage-backed securities was the Fund's largest return contributor, supported by strong investor demand, limited net supply, low borrower delinquencies, continued deleveraging and resilient housing fundamentals. Non-qualified mortgage and other new-issue credit curves continued to flatten.

Commercial mortgage-backed securities ("CMBS"), particularly Small Balance Commercial, was the second-largest contributor. Senior and subordinate tranches benefited from attractive carry and meaningful spread tightening. Within conduit CMBS, we remain focused on seasoned, deleveraged subordinate tranches that we believe can return 100% of principal through loan paydowns and property liquidations.

Corporate Structured Notes generated solid returns from high carry, although flattening of the 30-year/2-year SOFR curve weighed on prices late in the period. Asset backed performance remained bifurcated, with subprime borrowers facing growing affordability pressures, though investment-grade spreads remained relatively stable.
